The example of language that I chose to elaborate on is that of the online world—possibly one of the most influential and commonly used interfaces in our country. Interestingly enough, the terms and steps taken to get “online” can be interpreted as a metaphor for human society and human interaction in general. For instance, the concept of establishing a “connection” is in essence one of the most valuable skills attainable in the overall scheme of social relations. In life, connections can get us everything from valuable job offers to free trips to Disney Land; the possibilities are only bound by our own perseverance. An online connection follows much the same trend—it serves as an intermediary to the luxuries of the internet. After this connection is established, once again, all that is holding us back is the extent of our imagination. In short, the internet seems best defined as an intangible utopia, one which mirrors the opportunities and prospects that await us in our actual lives.
